SMALL CHANGES THAT (RE)START BIG

changes

Age range: from 2 to 12 years old (adapted to age)

Aim: To challenge the students to put small actions of solidarity into action, so they together can (re)start big changes.

Development:

The character Jiwa appears with a ball of wool telling students about the solidarity campaign “Restart to Transform”, and he suggests they do the following activity:

One ball of yarn will be used in each classroom as a “guideline”.

Five children will be presented with a solidarity challenge, either every day or one per week (according to the facilitator), and they will be passed the ball. The person with the ball has to commit to a solidary action (whether big or small) that same day or throughout the week, at school, at home, or wherever they wish. In the classroom we can help them out with some ideas.

Then, the five who had previously been challenged will briefly offer their experience and write their action down on a post-it note.

The post-it note will be added to a piece of the wool (to avoid tearing the paper, we recommend cutting the wool and later tying it back on) and it will be hung in the classroom.

The five children from the previous challenge will choose the next five, who will be challenged to carry out a new solidary action, which may be whatever they want.

The same process will be done until all the students have done their solidarity action, and all these actions will be hung around the classroom.

You may wish to suggest that the threads be joined together with those of other classrooms if they are close together, as a reminder that a set of small actions can reinitiate big changes between all of us.

Material

A ball of wool, Post-it notes
