Tuesday:

Transformation from solidarity

Blessed are those who follow the Lord along the path of the Good Samaritan. Those who dare to walk in his footsteps, to overcome the difficulties of their journey, to overcome their fatigue along the way.

Blessed are those who give their lives for others. Those who work hard for those who long for justice. Those who build the Kingdom from remote places. Those who, anonymously and without front pages, give their lives so that others may live longer and better.

Blessed are those who, with their daily sacrifice, open up traces of new humanity in a world sickened by the selfishness of the “God-Market”.

Blessed are those who work for the poor, from the poor, together with the poor, with the heart of the poor.

Blessed are those in solidarity who leave the clean and comfortable asphalt road to walk on the stony and dusty paths, that open to us the world of people who do not count in the numbers or statistics of the economic market.

Blessed are those who love their brothers and sisters in particular. Those who do not remain in words, but show their true love in deeds of life, companionship, and sincere dedication.

Blessed are those who teach, those who try to make sure that everyone learns without distinction of skin color, gender, or economic status.

Blessed are those who find that love, today, is revealed in a way: solidarity.
